Carranza is advancing on Mexico City with 70,000 armed men and that because of Carranza's refusal to give any guarantees of political amnesty, etc., Carbajal will attempt to meet this force with armed resistance is causing considerable alarm.

The Constitutionalist junta here is saved a statement to-day setting forth the views of Carranza, in which he acknowledges his obligation to the United States, which he says "has been of incalculable aid to the Constitutionalist cause"; declares his purpose to protect foreigners in Mexico City and to entertain all just claims for damages occasioned by the revolution.

With Carranza's refusal to arrange for a peaceful transition of the government, recognition by the United States will be withheld pending a general election. Instead of recognizing the provisional government which would have been set up immediately be peaceful agreement of the factions, the American government which would have been set up immediately be peaceful agreement of the factions, the American government to be established, and American military and naval forces will not be withdrawn from Vera Cruz until a stable administration is in power.

The only terms upon which the Constitutionalist chief had agreed to receive the federal representatives were that they should agree to the unconditional surrender of the capital, executive authority and the federal army. These terms the commissioners, General Laure Villar and David G. Allende, were not empowered to grant.
